Market summary

- Gold has started to rise again
- Base metals prices on the London Metal Exchange were mostly higher at the close of trading on Wednesday January 9
- Oil futures marked their highest finish since mid-December

Precious metals prices settled higher on Wednesday, as a benchmark dollar index dropped to a three-month low. Prices for the precious metal then extended gains into electronic trading shortly after minutes from the FOMC's December meeting revealed that some FED members wanted to hold policy steady in December. The news put even more pressure on the dollar. February gold traded at $1,294 an ounce.

Base Metals prices on the London Metal Exchange were mostly higher at the close of trading on Wednesday January 9, with a continued uptrend in copper, nickel and tin futures topping gains while a softer US dollar index continues to support commodity investment.

NYMEX Oil prices rally Wednesday, with the U.S. benchmark up an eight session in a row to finish at the highest level in nearly a month, on continued optimism over U.S.-China trade talks, an OPEC production decline and a weekly decrease in domestic inventories. February West Texas Intermediate oil, to settle at $52 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.
